

Market Outlook

The U.S. dollar traded near its lowest in more than two weeks versus major peers on Thursday, tracking Treasury yields lower, after minutes of the Federal Reserve's March policy meeting offered no new catalysts to dictate market direction. Fed officials remained cautious about the risks of the pandemic - even as the U.S. recovery gathered steam amid massive stimulus - and committed to pouring on monetary policy support until a rebound was more secure, the minutes showed Wednesday. Fed Chair Jerome Powell will speak at a virtual International Monetary Fund conference later on Thursday.

Gold prices remain connected at the hip to movements in the US 10-year bond yields. Overnight, US 10-years rose slightly which pushed gold 0.33% lower to USD1737.70 an ounce, with gold rising slightly to USD1738.70 an ounce in a moribund Asian session. Although the rally has halted temporarily at the USD1745.00 an ounce resistance level, gold's overall performance remains impressive, notably because it has formed a series of daily lows at the 61.80% Fibonacci leave near USD1685.00 an ounce. That keeps the premise that gold is creating a longer-term base firmly in place.
